ARCHAEOLOGY IN TIGRAY

CURRENT RESEARCH ON THE LATE ANTIQUE AND MEDIEVAL PERIODS

Archaeology in Tigray has a long history, with scientific research beginning 120 years ago with the Deutsche-Aksum Expedition. Since then, pre-Aksumite and Aksumite remains have received the lion's share of scholarly attention. More recently, however, the transition between the end of Aksum and the subsequent periods has attracted growing interest, shedding light on the so-called "Dark Ages" of northern Ethiopia (7th-12th centuries) and partly compensating for the silence of textual sources.

Excavations and surveys have been conducted in and around sites that are key to the history and memory of events linked to the arrival of Islam in the region, the Metropolitans of the Ethiopian Church, and the later-sanctified Zagwe dynasty. Previously overlooked themes, such as landscape evolution, agriculture, and the presence of Muslim communities during the Solomonid period, have also been the subject of new research, drawing on epigraphic discoveries and the development of archaeo-environmental approaches.

These advances in archaeological research are increasingly complemented by social anthropology, which makes it possible to study how communities living on archaeological sites construct memory around them, as well as their current practices in preserving these places. This approach also sheds light on how archaeological fieldwork is perceived locally.

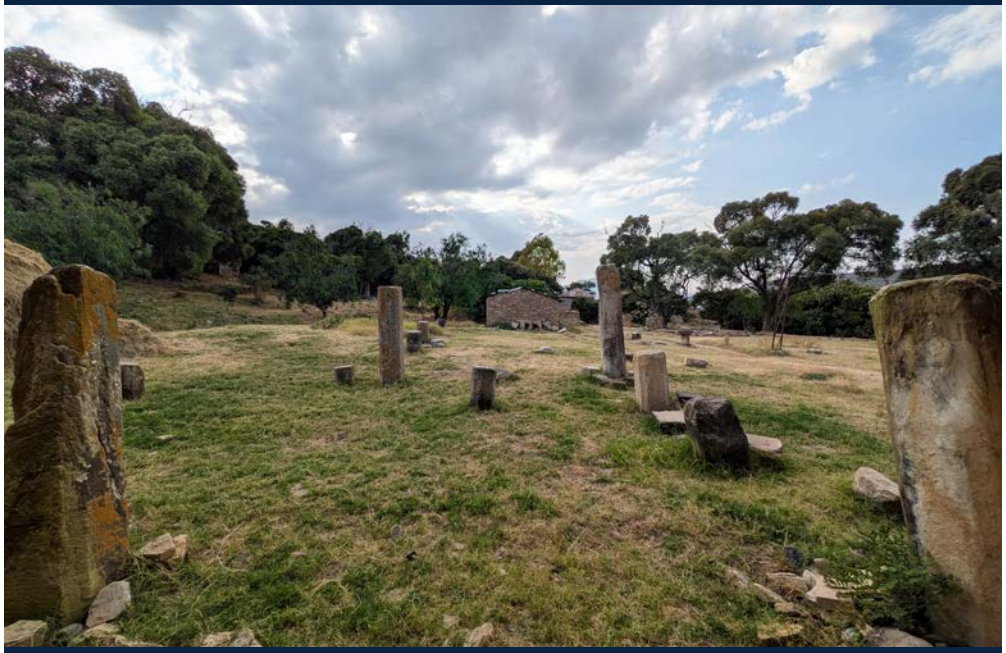

This workshop brings together archaeologists, anthropologists, and geographers from Ethiopia, France, and Poland to share recent advances in the field and to discuss perspectives for future research in the historical archaeology of northern Ethiopia.
